With the exception of the t.-p. this copy corresponds to the description given by Ames, in his Typographical antiquities, and by Brydges, in his British bibliographer, of the edition of 1527. The t.-p. of the 1527 edition,

Higden, Ranulf d. 1364. ——— [Policronicon ... [1527?]. (Card 2)

as reproduced by Ames, has the word "Polycronycon" in large Gothic letters in red, between the portrait of the king and the representation of St. George killing the dragon, and at the bottom of the page, also in red, the device of John Reynes. The t.-p. of the present copy has the title on a tablet above the king's portrait, and Reynes's device at each end of this tablet instead of at the foot of the page.
This is a reprint of the edition printed by Wynken de Worde in 1495. The only variation appears to be the introduction of a few woodcuts and the omission of the date of Wynken de Worde's edition at the end. cf. Brydges, The British bibliographer, v. 4, p. 349-350.

(Card 3)

Higden's work, divided into seven books and extending to the year 1348, was originally written in Latin. The present English translation was made by John de Trevisa, who continued it to 1357. The eighth book, 1358–1466, was added by Caxton, who in 1482 printed the work from Trevisa's translation, revising the antiquated text. His continuation is of interest as being the only original work of any magnitude from his pen. cf. Blades, Life and typography of William Caxton, v. 2, p. 125.

The first book comprises a brief description of the countries of the known world, and a more particular account of Great Britain.
